Additional Comments

Of the facade's many striking features, the most impressive are the eight life-size terracotta male half-figures—called atlantes after the titan Atlas of Greek mythology—resembling similar ones at Dresden's early eighteenth-century Zwinger Palace. They guard the front porch, glaring at passers-by. But they are not the only faces watching. Winged heads peer from scrolled keystones in the arches of the front porch, a headdressed women leans from the molding above each second-story window; a kingly bust with flowing beard and drooping mustache crowns the arched window on the third story; and pressed-tin lions stake out the corners of the roof. Craftsman Cyril Colnik created the lacy wrought ironwork trimming the porch roof, terrace, and balcony.

Ornate decoration continues inside the thirty-room mansion. In the dark central entrance hall, extensive carving decorates the divided wooden staircase, with floral and scroll motifs, women, and watchful lions. Baroque carved woodwork highlights the first-story rooms. Even some of the ceilings consist of oak panels and beams.

Joseph Kalvelage was an executive in a plumbing-fixture firm (which may explain why his house has seven bathrooms). He and his wife Dorothea hired one of Milwaukee's leading German-immigrant architects, Otto Strack, to design their mansion. At this time many wealthy German Milwaukeeans left established German neighborhoods, such as Brewers' Hill, and moved into opulent mansions elsewhere in the city. Captain Frederick Pabst built his famous German Renaissance Revival mansion on Grand (now West Wisconsin) Avenue in 1892. The Kalvelages, Harnischfegers, and others emulated Pabst, moving to the west side and embracing German Renaissance Revival architecture for their new residences. Unlike Pabst's neighborhood, the Kalvelages' neighborhood remained middle class.

Additional Comments	Walter E. Wetzel owned the Metropolitan Club which hosted black entertainers in the midst of Jim Crow laws. He lived here in 1950. With white hostility pressing in on all sides, the African-American population in Milwaukee worked on creating an encouraging and vibrant community within the confines of segregation. By the 1940s, black owned businesses like barber shops, shopkeepers, and law offices led to the emergence of a modest sized middle class, and paved the way for nightclubs and entertainment. Like most segregated cities in America, a string of safe and acceptable locations for African-American performers began to materialize in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Black entertainers like Billie Holliday, Duke Ellington, and Louis Armstrong passed through on this route, known as the Chitlin Circuit; a network of clubs and venues around the Midwest, the South, and the East Coast. During the heydays of jazz, passing entertainers could be seen and heard playing at inner core clubs like the Metropole, the Flame, and Moon Glow.

Additional Comments	A 'site file' exists for this property. It contains additional information such as correspondence, newspaper clippings, or historical information. It is a public record and may be viewed in person at the Wisconsin Historical Society, State Historic Preservation Office. 2014- "The Arthur G. Wolff Apartment building is a four-story Art Deco apartment building constructed in 1931 and designed by Bruce Uthus. It is a four-story building with an L-plan and clad in brick. It has a flat roof with decorative terra cotta tiles and coping. The main entrance is centered on a wing at the northeast corner of the building, and set back from the street by a series of concrete steps and a sidewalk. It has a substantial masonry door surround with a zig-zag pattern carved into it. It retains the original wood and glass door with a rectangular transom and sidelights. Above the door, on each story, is a grouping of three windows: a three-over-one, double hung sash wood window flanked by two-over-one, double-hung sash. At the corners and between some windows are terra cotta panels with similar zig-zag patterns to what is found on the door surround. Windows on the facade are primarily three-over-one, double hung, wood sash." -"W Wisconsin Ave, 20th St-35th St", WisDOT #2190-00-00, Prepared by Mead & Hunt, Inc. (2014).
