Bird said it began operating last fall and that its riders have logged more than 1 million miles. The privately owned Venice scooters in about 20 cities.

The scooters are gathered up each night for charging and repairs, the company says.

"It also keeps Birds from cluttering sidewalks," the company said in a news release.

"In the morning, Birds are parked at 'nests,' which are on private property conveniently located for riders across our market. Birds at each nest, although sometimes property owners agree to host more."

The company's scooters were back on the street Friday, and several riders were spotted on them in late morning, including City Hall.
